

BEYOND DIVINE

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, Than are dreamt of in your philosophy." Shakespeare

Every culture has its own way of making sense of the unknown: Those things which can be felt but not measured, believed but not proven. Mythology, religion, and fairy tales of some form, fill the void of that which cannot be explained by science.

Through these images, I am exploring the embodiment of the Divine: Deities in human form, perfect creatures charging us with looking deeper into our spiritual selves. Sometimes it is easier to let your soul shine when your exterior is not your own.

How do we hide ourselves behind our masks and under our clothes. What do we hide, what do we reveal? What is divine and what is made up? What if we stopped dressing up, stopped hiding behind our masks, can we touch the divine with them on, does the divine see us anyway?
